

Photo

Autumn at A-State

Lately, students are enjoying walking on campus and seeing the changing of the leaves. The autumn season enhances the beauty of the A-State campus.

One of the many squirrels on campus, carrying a nut in its mouth while climbing down a tree.

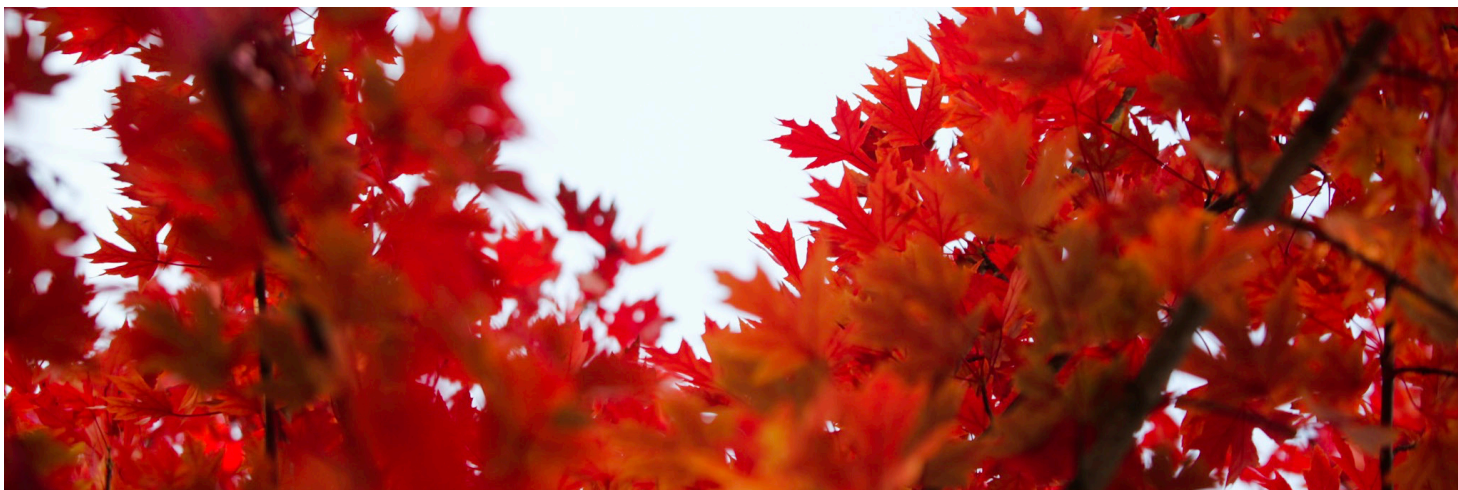

The many trees of varying colors are a welcome sight. This particular tree is outside the Communication and Education building.

Students are particularly having fun riding the VeoRide Scooters around campus in the temperate evening weather.

The long rows of trees outside the Humanities and Social Sciences building provide a bright and colorful display on campus.

Bright red leaves still hanging in the trees during these last remaining days of autumn. Soon each of these leaves will fall to the ground and, hopefully, be replaced with snowflakes this winter.

While the trees will not stay colorful and cluttered for long, they currently provide a lovely view when walking to and from class.

Photos by: Hannah Risker | Photo Editor