For All the World to See

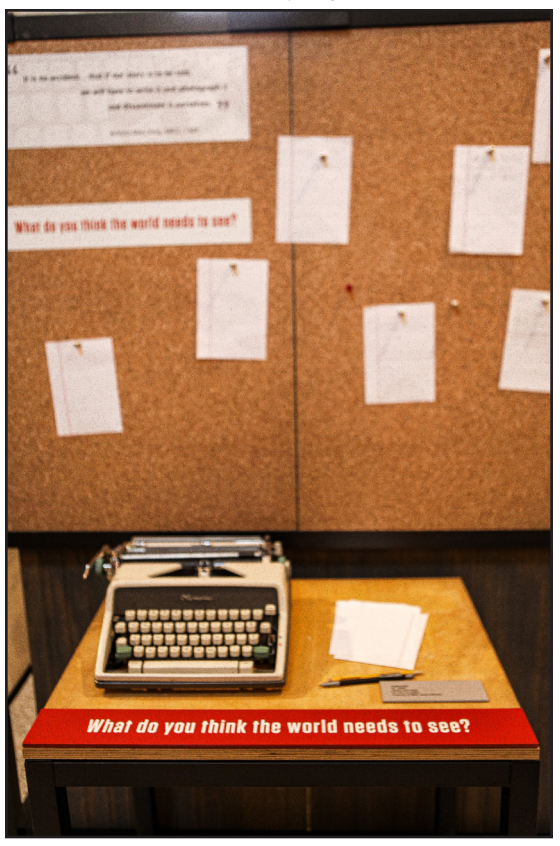

Mattison Griffin, a graduate student from Van Buren, flips through a book. Majoring in history with an emphasis in Public History, Griffin takes a special interest in the collection.

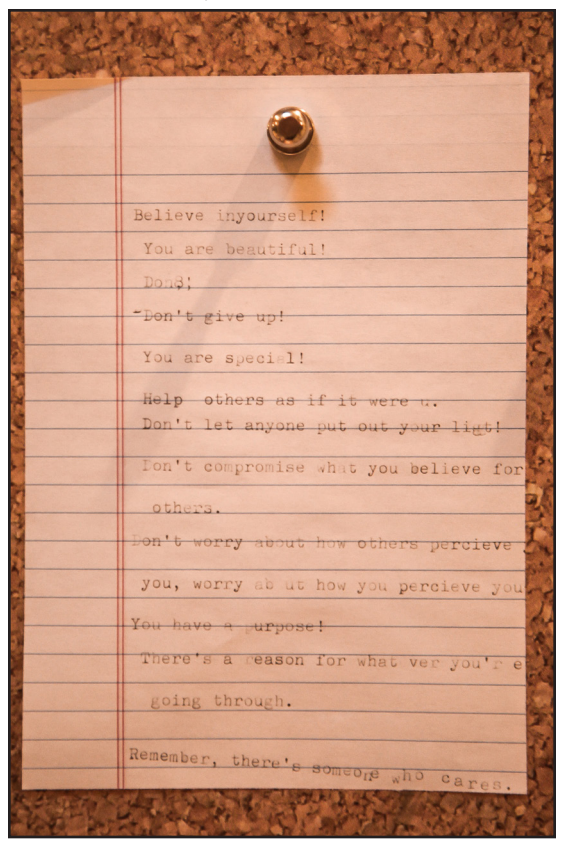

The exhibit, For All the World to See, found on the top floor of the Museum in the Library, showcases African American history in America. Many photographs, books, and dolls are included, as well as video screens displaying films and musical performances by famous performers.

The exhibit showcases many photographs with detailed summaries of the history at the time and the significance of the photos. For instance, this details the protest against theaters showing the movie, "Song of the South".

A typewriter is stationed a prompt listed below. Many responses were pinned to the board, answering the question.

A particular response to the question, "What do you think the world needs to see?".

The quote, "The world seldom believes the horror stories of history until they are documented via the mass media", by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. is largely the theme of the exhibit. Some of the photos included in the collection are graphic, yet important glimpses of the past.

Photographs of important points in time hang on the wall in the museum.

Photos by: Hannah Risker | Photo Editor