

Photo

Growing the A-State Wolf Pack

Inside the A-State box given to the high school counselors is sunglasses, pens, and information about admission standards and scholarship opportunities for potential upcoming students.

The A-State recruitment tent at the Articulations event. From left to right: Adrien Everett, Director of Transfer Student Services, Cynthia Barnhill, an Admissions Counselor, Sydney Hickerson, an Admissions Counselor, and Robert Gordon, the Associate Director of Admissions. "The location of the event changes every year so we just happened to be the host this year. All different colleges and universities are here and high school counselors can just come through and get info and get to chat with the admissions counselors," says Gordon. A-State hosted the event Tuesday, outside the Centennial Bank Arena.

Kim Lovelace, the Director of Admissions and Student Engagement at Ozarka College, handing out a packet full of information for prospective students.

College tents line the parking lot of the Centennial Bank Arena. These tents include, University of Central Arkansas, Harding University, and Ozarka College.

Kevin Pearce from Enrollment Services at ASU Newport handing out information to a high school counselor at the ASUN tent.

Articulations is the "event where high school counselors in the state of Arkansas come to one central location and get information from different universities in the state of Arkansas in order to recruit students to their colleges," says Antwanet Wade, an Admissions Counselor at A-State.

Kim Lovelace (left) and Erika Roark, the Recruitment Specialist, at the Ozarka College tent.

The event was done in a safe manner to abide with Covid-19 precautions. Every college representative wore a mask and the counselors were encouraged to stay inside their vehicles.